A dark blue diagonal gradient bar that starts from the bottom left corner and extends towards the top right corner, covering the lower half of the slide.

This photo shows historical perspective in that when i took this picture i thought if someone were to take this same exact picture 300 years ago it would in the eyes of a child who is upset that the virus has taken something important out their day to day life. This also shows how we are reacting to the spread of the virus, taping off the playgrounds would definitely help stall the spread of the virus.

This photo shows historical significance because since the virus many stores including this one are out of business which makes it hard for some families to make money which hurts the economy immensely. This picture is important to capture because it shows the stages of the virus in full affect.

This photo shows cause and consequence because when this first broke out i was only thinking about quarantine, i was even starting to think about how social tasks were going to operate. When they said everyone needed to be 6 feet apart it was a shock to me and my family. The long lines at grocery stores are definitely a consequence of this virus.

And this last photo shows continuity and change. It shows it because no one was expecting online orders to be such a big part of the virus and coping with it. Maybe after the virus is so infective online orders might be more popular than regular shopping which is a drastic change in the economy.
